About Pain

Pain affects millions of people everyday. Halting the lives of people with the pain and also their partners, families and people around them. At some time in our lives we are all affected by this system that is designed not as a warning system telling you something is about to happen but as a system that is telling us something is already wrong! Quantum Pain Therapy is about to change what we know about pain and how we can learn to remove unwanted pain and repair our body systems preventing the return of unwanted pain.

How can we suppress pain?

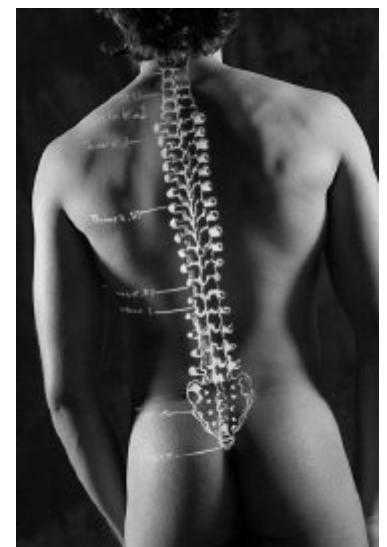

When the "gate theory of pain" was devised in the mid sixties, the idea was that when pain signals first reach the nervous system they excite activity in a group of small neurons that form a kind of pain "pool." When the total activity of these neurons reaches a certain minimal level, a hypothetical "gate" opens up that allows the pain signals to be sent to higher brain centres, but nearby neurons in contact with the pain cells can suppress activity in the pain pool so that the gate stays closed.

The gate-closing cells include large neurons that are stimulated by non painful touching or pressing of your skin. The theory explained such everyday behaviour as scratching a scab, or rubbing a sprained ankle: the scratching and rubbing excite just those nerve cells sensitive to touch and pressure that can suppress the pain pool cells. Pain studies received an added boost when investigators made the surprising discovery that the brain itself produces chemicals that can also control pain! The landmark discovery of the pain-suppressing chemicals came about because scientists in Aberdeen, Scotland and at the Johns Hopkins University Hospital in Baltimore were curious about how morphine and other opium-derived painkillers, or analgesics work.

For some time Neuroscientists had known that chemicals were important in conducting nerve signals (small bursts of electric current) from cell to cell. In order for the signal from one cell to reach the next in line, the first cell secretes a chemical "neurotransmitter" from the tip of a long fibre that extends from the cell body. The transmitter molecules cross the gap separating the two cells and attach to special receptor sites on the neighbouring cell surface. Some neurotransmitters excite the second cell allowing it to generate an electrical signal. Others inhibit the second cell preventing it from generating a signal. When investigators found that the morphine molecules fitted snugly into receptors on certain brain and spinal cord neurons, the scientists wondered, could the human brain, the product of millions of years of evolution come equipped with receptors for a man-made drug? Perhaps there were naturally occurring brain chemicals that behaved exactly like morphine?

The Natural Power of Quantum Therapy The gate can also be closed from above, by brain cells activating a descending pathway to block pain. The Scientists conjectured that brain-based pain control systems were also activated when people behaved heroically ignoring pain to finish a football game, or to help a more severely wounded Soldier on the battlefield. The mind code that is telling you that you are in pain can be removed simply by your own thoughts instantly and naturally closing the gate and suppressing the pain.
